Customer Reviews

I received this book as a Christmas present, and I am still rather confused about the contents because it has no attributed author and only the barest of introductions as to why it has been published .The intro is a one pager on the topic of "These Events Bear Repeating". The questions it asks are "Why are we so intrigued by history", "Do we long to be part of a different age?" "Do we wish we were part of great events as they happened". My personal answer to these questions is "I don't know, but wish I did", "No!" and "No!". Did the book show any light on the first question for me? Not really, except, perhaps, to indicate that knowing pieces of history like this could spur on some people to discover what past history may have to say about the current condition of the world and the motivation and attitudes of leaders and personalities of various countries in the world.The book is a heavy one, so it is not something easily stowed away in a bag for travelling - and it is a long one, too, comprising 704 pages in 14 chapters each containing about 15-20 events on the topic of that particular chapter. In its introduction, the book makes the following observations:* Humans have an amazing capacity for invention* Humans also have a magnificent creativity* People are capable of immense goodness* People also , however, are capable of unspeakable cruelty and greed,* Humans have a great capacity to overcome seemingly insurmountable odds" These events will probably not be repeated. The atrocities will not be repeated because keeping them in our sights, we now know better. The best events are part of the past, but they are also what paved the way for the best of our current times.
